Parents beware that predators may be using online gaming to target their children. According to the FBI's website, there are 750,000 predators online at any given time and they all could have a virtual key to your house via the Internet.

"A lot of the online games have multiplayer features where you are connected to people all over the world, whether that's live chat over a microphone or live chat on a keyboard. You can be connected to almost anybody," child advocate Callahan Walsh of the National Centre for Missing and Exploited Children said. Microsoft, which owns "Minecraft," (one of the most popular games in the world) said in a statement, "Helping keep kids safer online has always been a priority for us at Microsoft. We encourage parents to also play an active role in their children's online activities."

Ericka Souter, editor of Mom.me, outline rules that parents should use with their kids to police online games dangers. Space Exploration

The possibility of exploring space has long excited people in many walks of life, for most of the latter 20th century and into the early 21st century, only national governments could afford the very high costs of launching people and machines into space. This reality meant that space exploration had to serve very broad interests, and it indeed has done so in a variety of ways.

Government space programs have increased knowledge, served as indicators of national prestige and power, enhanced national security and military strength and provided significant benefits to the general public. In areas where the private sector could profit from activities in space, most notably the use of satellites as telecommunication, commercial activity has flourished without government funding. In the period of early 21st century, entrepreneurs believed that there were several other areas of commercial potential in space, mainly privately-funded space travel.

NASA experts also believe that more investment in exploration of space will lead to an enhanced discovery of solar systems in the cosmos and a deeper understanding of the universe surrounding our planet, including asteroids, planets, stars and objects that orbit in and near to our galaxy.

Eating Habits in the Social Media Age!

Technology is not just changing the way we communicate – it's changing the way we eat too. Take social media for example, sharing food snaps on Instagram, Facebook and Twitter have grown into a worldwide phenomenon. Certain influencers have made an entire career out of utilising this craze for food on their feeds.

Being constantly bombarded with eating routines of influencers on social media, like Instagram, can lead to a negative relationship with food and can even cause us to feel ashamed or envious at times. The most recent data from the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare showed that 17% of children are overweight, and 7.7% are obese. This means that nearly 1 in 4 children has an increased risk of physical health issues, increased chances of illness and mortality in adulthood.

For restaurant owners, food growers and the retail marketers, the rise of social media has influenced what food they sell, how they sell it and even what they should do next. Before Instagram, charging 10£ for a sandwich in London was a daylight robbery; however, now with the help of social media, it is a commonly accepted price to pay.
